Report on Job Portals Providing Limited Feedback to Rejected Candidates

Step 1: Observation Points

- Many job seekers apply for jobs through online job portals but receive rejection emails without any explanation.
- Most job portals send generic automated responses such as “Your profile was not selected”.
- Candidates are unable to identify skill gaps or mistakes in their applications.
- Lack of feedback limits opportunities for self-improvement.
- Continuous rejection without guidance reduces confidence and motivation.
- Some portals do not provide any response after interviews.

Step 2: User Identification

Job Seekers (Candidates):

Role: Apply for jobs through online portals.

Expectations: Transparent communication and constructive feedback.

Employers / Recruiters:

Role: Shortlist and hire candidates.

Expectations: Fast and efficient recruitment.

Job Portal Platforms:

Role: Connect employers and job seekers.

Expectations: Scalable systems and high engagement.

Step 3: Interviews / Surveys

- Have you applied for jobs through online job portals?
- Do you receive rejection notifications?
- Does the rejection include specific feedback?
- Have you ever been told the reason for rejection?
- Does lack of feedback affect your confidence?
- Would feedback help improve your applications?
- Any suggestions to improve job portals?

Summary

A survey was conducted among job seekers who actively use online job portals. Most respondents stated that they either receive generic rejection messages or no response at all. Very few candidates receive meaningful feedback. This makes it difficult for candidates to understand their weaknesses and improve their employability. Repeated rejection without feedback leads to frustration and loss of confidence. The survey shows that job portals focus on application processing but fail to support candidate growth.

Suggestions from the Survey

- Job portals should provide basic rejection feedback.
- Automated feedback categories can be introduced.
- Recruiters should share short feedback after interviews.
- AI-based tools can analyze resumes and suggest improvements.
- Learning resources can be linked to feedback.

Step 4: Pain-Point Analysis

Functional Pain Point:

Lack of feedback on rejection.

Emotional Pain Point:

Low confidence and frustration.

Systemic Pain Point:

Employer-centric platform design.

Most Critical Pain Point

The lack of constructive feedback is the most critical pain point because it prevents candidates from learning from rejection and improving their employability.

Step 5: Root Cause Identification (5-Why Analysis)

Why is feedback not provided?

– Rejection messages are automated.

Why are they automated?

- Recruiters handle large volumes of applications.

Why is individual feedback avoided?

- It is time-consuming and not mandatory.

Why is feedback not mandatory?

- Platforms prioritize speed and scalability.

Why is candidate experience ignored?

- Employer convenience is given priority.

Root Causes Identified

- Heavy reliance on automation
- High application volumes
- No standardized feedback system
- Platform focus on employers

Step 6: Wicked Problem Understanding

Providing feedback to every rejected candidate is a wicked problem because it requires balancing recruiter workload, platform scalability, and candidate expectations. Improving feedback increases effort and cost while lack of feedback harms candidate experience.

Step 7: Reflection

This study helped understand that job portals are not only hiring platforms but also play a role in candidate development. Analyzing survey responses highlighted the importance of feedback-driven systems. User-centered design is essential for improving digital hiring platforms.
